Cat food ranked by a cat

	Feeding style	Pros	Cons
S	 Whole prey	• Easy to source from breeding facilities • Can offer variety if you find the right places • Natural proteins cats would eat outside • Mental stimulation benefits from chewing • Appropriately sized for cats • Simple and quick meal prep	• Breeding facility basically feeds them kibble • More expensive than DIY • Feeders are not raised in natural environment • Guessing game with nutritional completeness
A	  DIY with variety (raw or cooked)	• Easy to find ingredients at farms, markets, grocery stores, or online • Feeding variety in proteins and ingredients • Meal prep is easy (for boneless recipes) • More nutrients come from food vs supplements • Least expensive feeding option	• No mental stimulation from chewing (unless you feed rmb) • No dental cleaning benefits from chewing (unless you feed rmb) • Meal prep takes longer when you feed PMR style or cooked
B	 DIY with premix (raw or cooked)	• Very easy for beginners because it's limited ingredients • Quick meal prep • Least expensive feeding option	• Relying on supplements vs food (unless you use Alnutrin for meat and bone) • No mental stimulation benefit from chewing • No dental cleaning benefits from chewing
C	  Commercial fresh	• Already complete and balanced nothing to add • Easy to portion and serve • Lots of variety available • Subscribe and save options • Fresh and natural ingredients (comparing to processed)	• No mental stimulation benefit from chewing • No dental cleaning benefits from chewing • Most expensive option
D	 Canned food	• Cheap • Easy • Better option if you can only choose between canned and dry food	• Cheap • Many canned foods also too high in carbs • Lots of synthetics and other yucky ingredients
F	 Dry food	• Cheap • Easy	• Cheap • Dry food too low in moisture and too high in carbs • Many canned foods also too high in carbs • Lots of synthetics and other yucky ingredients
